

中国网络小说、性别与民族主义：男频与女频的比较研究

作者贡献

张玥（香港理工大学 中国历史及文化学系 研究助理）：概念构思、初稿撰写、审查与编辑

李镇邦（香港理工大学 应用社会学系 助理教授）：概念构思、监督指导、审查与编辑

Journal of Contemporary China（当代中国杂志 SSCI）审稿中

摘要：

背景与研究空白

中国网络文学已发展成为一个拥有超5亿读者的庞大文化产业。在“一带一路”和统战工作等国家战略的影响下，网络小说成为了意识形态表达与文化输出的重要载体。在中国数字阅读市场中，小说通常按目标受众的性别被严格划分为男频和女频。目前的学术界多聚焦于平台垄断机制、BL小说的酷儿阅读，或反霸权叙事。多数研究固化了一种刻板印象：认为女频小说是纯粹建立在浪漫与情感上的“去政治化”乌托邦，而民族主义等显性政治表达则是男频的专属。因此，目前缺乏跨性别的比较研究来探讨民族主义等主流政治意识形态是如何在不同性别的文学中被嵌入和分化的。

本研究旨在填补这一空白，探讨：（1）作者的政治观点是如何在网络小说中表达的？（2）女频小说中是否存在政治表达？（3）男女频小说在民族主义表达上的异同是什么？

研究方法

鉴于男频小说内容同质化较高，而女频小说子类型丰富，本研究采用基于文本细读的定性内容分析法。从中国头部文学网站（晋江、起点、纵横）选取了5部在2014至2023年间出版的极具代表性和商业成功的小说。样本包括1部男频小说（《最强狂兵》）和4部跨越不同题材的女频小说：《偷偷藏不住》（异性恋言情）、《制霸好莱坞》（非言情/事业向）、《小蘑菇》（BL/科幻）以及《末日乐园》（大女主/无限流）。

主要发现

文本分析表明，男女频小说中都深刻嵌入了民族主义，赞美中国传统文化和现代共产主义意识形态。然而，它们的展现形式和潜在的政治态度存在显著差异。

对抗性 vs. 隐性民族主义： 在男频小说中，民族主义往往是对抗性的；外国（尤其是美日）被明确塑造成为需要被主角在物理上击败的地缘政治敌人。相反，女频小说展现了两种独特的民族主义。第一种是隐性的“去西方化”。例如在《偷偷藏不住》中，主角的精英地位完全脱离了西方教育或海外旅行经历——这与十年前的网文套路形成鲜明对比。西方在小说中“隐身”了，这反映了一种正在崛起的文化自信，即本土中国身份已足以完成精英身份的建构。

作为“被征服见证者”的西方： 第二种是显性的文化优越感。在《制霸好莱坞》中，主角征服美国娱乐圈不仅靠演技，更根本的是依靠东方哲学和马克思主义辩证法。西方社会不再是被崇拜的彼岸，而是被降格为被征服的领地和中国思维优越性的被动见证者。

集体主义的双刃剑： 与男频文本中单一的民族主义不同，女频小说对现代中国共产核心心理念——“集体主义”——表现出高度微妙甚至相互矛盾的反思。在《小蘑菇》中，集体主义被描绘成人类的最终救世主，为了物种生存而牺牲个人人权和女性生育权被合法化，呼应了官方“人类命运共同体”的宏大叙事。相反，《末日乐园》则对极端的集体主义和“维稳”进行了批判性反思，揭示了一种自上而下的高度管控的社会秩序如何瘫痪个体能动性、极度限制自由，并最终引发末日危机（尽管作者也承认该体制的强大力量）。

结论

本研究打破了“女频网文是去政治化的浪漫幻想”这一刻板印象，指出当代中国女性读者和作者深度参与了民族主义与国家意识形态的话语建构。与男频小说直接、攻击性的民族主义不同，女频文学在绝对的文化优越感与对集体体制的深刻反思之间摇摆。这种基于性别的分化，不仅丰富了网络文学研究，也为洞察民族自信崛起时代中国青年女性复杂且多面的政治态度提供了独特的视角。

关键词：中国网络文学；性别差异；民族主义；集体主义；政治表达

Chinese Internet Novels, Gender, and Nationalism: A Comparative Study of Male- and Female-Oriented Literatures

Abstract

1. Background and Research Gap

Chinese internet literature has evolved into a massive cultural industry, boasting over 500 million readers and generating immense commercial and cultural value. Influenced by state-led initiatives like the "Belt and Road" and united front work, online novels have become crucial vehicles for ideological expression and cultural export. In the Chinese digital reading market, novels are strictly categorized by the gender of their target audience: male-oriented (Nanpin) and female-oriented (Nvpin).

Current academic discourse on Chinese online literature predominantly focuses on the industrial mechanism of platform monopolies, the queer reading practices of Boys' Love (BL) novels, or narratives that subvert mainstream hegemony. Most studies perpetuate the stereotype that female-oriented novels are apolitical utopias constructed purely on romance and intimacy, while overt political expressions like nationalism are exclusively the domain of male-oriented literature. Consequently, there is a distinct lack of comparative studies investigating how mainstream political ideologies, specifically nationalism, are embedded and differentiated across gendered literary categories. This study aims to fill this gap by addressing three core questions: (1) How are authors' political views expressed in Chinese internet novels? (2) Do female-oriented novels contain explicit political expressions? (3) What are the similarities and differences in nationalist expressions between male- and female-oriented novels?

2. Methodology

Recognizing the high content homogeneity in male-oriented novels and the rich subgeneric diversity in female-oriented novels, this study adopts a qualitative content analysis approach based on close reading. Five highly representative and commercially successful novels published between 2014 and 2023 were selected from China's top literary platforms (Jinjiang, Qidian, Zongheng). The sample includes one male-oriented novel (Captain China) and four female-oriented novels across different genres: Hidden Love (heterosexual romance), Hollywood Queen (non-romance, career-focused), Little Mushroom (BL/sci-fi), and World End & Playland (female protagonist/infinite flow).

3. Key Findings

The textual analysis reveals that nationalism is deeply embedded in both male- and female-oriented novels, praising traditional Chinese culture and modern Communist ideologies. However, their manifestations and underlying political attitudes differ significantly.

Combative vs. Implicit Nationalism: In male-oriented novels, nationalism is often combative; foreign countries (particularly the US and Japan) are explicitly framed as geopolitical enemies to be physically defeated by the protagonist. Conversely, female-oriented novels exhibit two unique forms of nationalism. The first is implicit "de-Westernization". For instance, in Hidden Love, the elite status of the protagonists is completely decoupled from Western education or overseas travel—a stark contrast to the tropes of a decade ago. The West becomes

"invisible," reflecting a rising cultural confidence where local Chinese identity is sufficient for elite validation.

The West as a Conquered Witness: The second form is explicit cultural superiority. In Hollywood Queen, the protagonist conquers the American entertainment industry not just through acting, but fundamentally through Eastern philosophy and Marxist dialectics. The Western society is no longer an idolized destination but reduced to a conquered territory and a passive witness to the superiority of Chinese thought.

The Double-Edged Sword of Collectivism: Unlike the monolithic nationalism in male-oriented texts, female-oriented novels demonstrate a highly nuanced, and sometimes contradictory, reflection on "Collectivism"—a core tenet of modern Chinese Communist ideology. In Little Mushroom, collectivism is portrayed as the ultimate savior of humanity. Sacrificing individual human rights and female reproductive freedom for the survival of the species is legitimized, echoing the official rhetoric of a "community with a shared future for mankind." Conversely, World End & Playland critically reflects on extreme collectivism and "stability maintenance" (维稳). It illustrates how a hyper-managed, top-down societal order paralyzes individual agency, heavily limits freedom, and ultimately triggers an apocalyptic crisis, despite acknowledging the formidable power of such a system.

4. Conclusion

This study challenges the conventional stereotype that female-oriented internet novels are apolitical romantic fantasies. It highlights that contemporary Chinese female readers and writers engage deeply with nationalist discourse and state ideologies. While male-oriented novels tend to express a straightforward, aggressive nationalism, female-oriented literature oscillates between absolute cultural superiority and profound critical reflection on collective systems. This gendered divergence not only enriches the study of online literature but also provides a unique lens into the complex, multifaceted political attitudes of modern Chinese female youths in an era of rising national confidence.

Key Words: Chinese Internet Literature; Gender Differences; Nationalism; Collectivism; Political Expression